Biographical / Historical

Wu Dizhou (Ng Tik-chou, Ng Tik Chow, 吳荻舟, 吳荻舟, 1907–1992, born in Longyan, Fujian) was a Chinese Communist political figure, journalist, and cultural activist active in British Hong Kong and Beijing. After studying in Shanghai's art institutions, he joined the Chinese Communist Party in 1930, was imprisoned in Nanjing for nearly eight years for student and labor activism. He was then released owing to the cooperation between the Nationalists and Communists, after which he continued literary and artistic work in Shanghai and actively promoted resistance against Japan. In 1938, under the guidance of Zhou Enlai, he served as captain of the First Team of the Third Department's Anti-Japanese Propaganda Corps of the Military Affairs Commission's Political Department, carrying out propaganda work in South and Southwest China. In 1946 he organized the China Song and Dance Drama Society in Hong Kong, and as editor of the Chinese Business Daily helped transfer democratic and cultural figures to Communist-controlled areas. He was central to the 1949 China Merchants' uprising in Hong Kong, and from 1950 to 1962 served as president of Wen Wei Po and consultant to China Merchants. Transferred to Beijing in 1962, he worked on Hong Kong and Macau affairs but was persecuted during the Cultural Revolution and exiled to Ningxia. In January 1976, Wu Dizhou's younger son, Wu Jian, committed suicide at the Technical School of the Northeast First Hydropower Engineering Bureau. Rehabilitated in 1978, Wu Dizhou retired in 1982 and died of heart disease in 1992. Segments of his diaries were later published by his daughter Fai Ng (Wu Hui).

Scope and Contents

The Wu Dizhou papers document both the professional career and personal life of Wu Dizhou, a Chinese Communist political figure, journalist, and cultural activist. After the Cultural Revolution, Wu participated in interviews and composed autobiographical writings that traced the ebbs and flows of his experiences during the tumultuous decades (Sub-Series I.1). Of particular note are his detailed accounts of his appointment to lead the First Team of the Anti-Japanese Resistance Propaganda Corps, beginning in 1938—later renamed the Seventh Team of Drama Propaganda in 1941. In various essays, Wu described the team's formation, membership, and travels with great care (Sub-Series I.2). A prolific writer, he produced several autobiographical narratives recalling his career in Hong Kong, drama scripts, and art reviews (Sub-Series I.3).

During the Cultural Revolution, Wu was forced to compose dozens of confessions detailing his work, motivations, and relationships, and also wrote dozens of testimonials in support of friends and former colleagues (Series II). These original writings constitute significant firsthand accounts of an individual's experiences during this tumultuous decade. Series III, arranged chronologically, contains correspondence between Wu and his friends and family, including both family letters and letters addressed to him posthumously. The collection also preserves photographs, albums, diaries, notebooks, and printed matter, which together provide further perspectives on Wu's life and career.

In addition, the papers include correspondence and administrative files concerning the life of Wu Jian, Wu Dizhou's second son, who committed suicide in January 1976 at Technical School of the Northeast First Hydropower Engineering Bureau. Series VIII comprises autobiographies, correspondence, and diaries by Zhang Peihua, Wu Dizhou's wife, who dedicated significant effort to organizing the Wu family files and preserving Wu's legacy.
